PERSONAL WISDOM Meaning in a Pragmatic World by Dan Siegel

Is it possible to reconcile our beliefs, which inevitably have some basis in our emotions, with the actual world around us? While this book does not pretend to have a solution to this ageless problem, it does seek to minimize the role of emotions or bias. Unfortunately, the current culture is failing us in this effort.

GEORGES KASSABGI

WHAT GAVE YOU THAT IDEA?

Rediscovering the Development of Our Worldviews

by Georges Kassabgi

With this essay (2012), the author searches what might help humanity improve the effectiveness of actions regarding global challenges. In particular, he invites us to consider anew primal material/nonmaterial attributes/interactions—underlying elements in the developments of existence—and remain aware that assumptions are not facts.

Kassabgi shares thought-provoking conversations with readers of his essay in “Postscripts” (2018), which includes a hypothesis/addendum (published/presented in 2013) dedicated to long-term resolution of conflicts; dealing with other issues (climate change and air/water/food pollution, say) that might benefit from same proposition. Noteworthy: keeping distinct “violence-for-protection/survival” versus “violence-for-abuse/punishment”; and human-versus nature-dependent inequalities; plus, recalling that: each worldview/-ism/policy has value... up to a point.

He therefore outlines/recommends a multidisciplinary study as the critical next step. PDF • Both books are available at no cost; go to: www.researchgate.net/search and enter author's full name (as Researcher) • Author's website: www.ugik.com
